figure in the Tombs Prison to-day than Berthe Claiche, the little French girl who shot down and killed Emil Gerdron, the voung giant who had made a miserable slave of her for six years. She is charged with murder in the first degree, yet in her cramped philosophy, no moral or statute law can convince her that her act was not one simple justice.

And as she unfolds her story and lays bare her hapless history since the day Gerdron fastened himself upon her like an incubus, is revealed her feeling toward the man whom, in a moment of desperate passion, she slew. In fact, DECLARES SHE WAS OF AGE. of desperate passion, she show the murder though the ink with which the murder charge was written is still fresh, a fund is being raised to defend the girl, and when all the story of the crime is known she will not want for earnest champions.

She told her story in the Tombs today simply and directly. She had no reservations to make, no secrets to guard. She had been the man's slave. He had degraded her and then lived upon the fruits of her degredation. At first she had loved him with the first love of a child. Later, when her eves were opened, she found herself subject to his will and control. Then she feared him, but as his cruelty became more and more pitiless the feeling of hate mingled with her fear.

Berthe Claiche was seventeen years old when she first met the black-haired, black-eyed young giant. Both were employed in an embroidery shop at No. 14 Boulevard de Chapelle, in Paris. Her people were poor, but she had been well brought up and well educated. When Gerdron made love to her she thought she had met her ideal and returned his declared affection.

The man was then old in the crimes that mark his kind as the most de-Dr. Halleck and his daughter were spicable. He lured the little French both in court.
